

Go-to-work COVID-19 temperature checks

Foster peace of mind at the workplace

The Quest Diagnostics Go-to-work temperature checks program is an essential way to help employers curb the spread of COVID-19 at worksites where individuals are unable to work remotely. When offering this program, a worksite location is staffed by Quest Diagnostics to ensure that employees do not have a fever when coming to work.*

This program allows the employer to determine the best course of action for employees who arrive to work with a fever. A fever is a key symptom of COVID-19. Offering this service, along with a planned triage for employees, can help employers prevent the spread of COVID-19 at the workplace.

An easy and convenient process for employees

Things to consider when offering a COVID-19 temperature checks

- Quest Diagnostics is providing staffing for the purpose of temperature checks as part of the “Go-to-work” employer program.
- Employers should develop a triage protocol so that employees have clear direction on what to do if they have a fever and/or meet other risk criteria.
- Employers will need to have an employer representative onsite to enable the triage protocol.
- Quest Diagnostics will take temperatures, can write the temperature reading down on an informational sheet (if requested), and direct the individual to the employer representative onsite for triage.
- Key considerations include: locations, shift times, recurring events (each day, every other day, etc), and availability of employer representatives. An employer representative must be present onsite to enable triage at all times temperature checks are taking place.
- Quest Diagnostics has providers who can provide services at multiple locations and across different shifts.
- As part of the triage protocol, employers can have employees answer risk questions. The Center for Disease Control and Prevention website provides guidance in understanding symptoms and qualifying those symptoms for COVID-19 risk.
